DESCRIPTION

Baby-sitter, flower seller, waitress, gas station attendant, employee in a convenience store...so many little jobs are done by young people. Teenagers come into the labour market at too young an age and give up activities related to their age group. The video brings up an interesting reflection about the social conditions of this group and the laws concerning them, demonstrating how these kids develop different kinds of relations to money, work, and school, illustrating this by way of interviews at their workplaces and other environments.
